Banns were originally used to notify people in a community of a coming marriage and to ascertain that there were no impediments to the marriage. If anyone knows any reason why this couple should not be married, they are morally obligated to report it to their parish priest.

GOSPEL REFLECTION

The Readings today point out that we are not just creatures who happen to be in the world by chance. Isaiah speaks of being formed in the womb to serve a purpose. The psalmist sees himself as destined to do God's will. St. Paul writes to the Corinthian Christians that they are called to take their place among the saints, and the rest of his letter shows what a challenge that is. In the Gospel John the Baptist speaks of himself as having been sent to baptize so that Jesus would be revealed, which is what last Sunday's feast was all about. Some people might object to the idea that we are formed for a purpose, destined, called, commanded. Many people would prefer to think of themselves as autonomous, creating their own destiny as they encounter life's challenges. And some people would see themselves as simply the product of their environment and should not be held to account for their actions. But the Scriptures are consistent in using the language of destiny, calling, challenge and response, with the implication that a true response to our destiny is real autonomy, and that being called does the very opposite of turning us into robots or victims of events.
